Supervising Across Generations

Participants of this training will understand the function of supervision in a generational context. We will explore giving feedback and responding more empathetically to a supervisees from different generations. There will be a focus on discussing the strengths of each generation and strategies for positive communication.

Speaker

Jorie Schwartz LISW-S, is a licensed social worker in Columbus. She is a graduate of the MSW program at The Ohio State University and has worked primarily in the areas of community mental health and school-based prevention. She worked as a field coordinator in the College of Social Work at OSU and is now in what she describes as her "dream job" as Assistant Professor of Social Work and Human Services at Columbus State Community College. She has managed many programs and has supervised staff and students for most of her career.

Angela Fry, LISW-S graduated from The Ohio State University with a Bachelor of Science and a Master of Science in Social Work. Angela's first job out of school was at CHOICES, a local domestic violence agency in Columbus, as a case manager for the women and children staying at the safe shelter. Angela then worked at Catholic Social Services for ten years in a variety of capacities; as a home-based clinician working with families involved with child protective services ; as an individual, couples and group counseling clinician and finally as the Clinical Supervisor of the Family Strengthening Division. Angela is currently an Associate Professor in the Social Work & Human Services program at Columbus State Community College.
